What does my child know about death?

Many times families have created a structure in their lives that includes how to react to death or what happens after death. Some families have rituals set in place through their religion, while others create new ones. It is important to know what your child understands developmentally in order to include them appropriately in explaining and honoring the death of your baby. The following information gives some detail as to how your child comprehends death so you are better able to communicate and share this experience with them.

Infants & Toddlers:
Infants and toddlers generally have no concept of what death is. Children under three are more reactive to your feelings as well as people they love, and may begin to fear death. Their reactions can include crying, anxiety, or an unwillingness to talk about the death. Because they are just beginning their development of the concept of death and dying, they rely on your compassion and reassurance to let them know they are all right. Allow them to talk, draw, or tell stories about the baby.

Preschoolers:
Younger elementary school children begin to understand death is final. They realize that they can die, as well as people they love, and may begin to fear death. Their reactions can include crying, anxiety, or an unwillingness to talk about the death. Because they are just beginning their development of the concept of death and dying, they rely on your compassion and reassurance to let them know they are all right. Allow them to talk, draw, or tell stories about the baby.

Ages 6 to 9:
Younger elementary school children begin to understand death is final. They realize that they can die, as well as people they love, and may begin to fear death. Their reactions can include crying, anxiety, or an unwillingness to talk about the death. Because they are just beginning their development of the concept of death and dying, they rely on your compassion and reassurance to let them know they are all right. Allow them to talk, draw, or tell stories about the baby.

Ages 9 to 12:
Death to tweens is very personal and realistic. They can differentiate between alive and dead, and understand that death is forever. Children this age will look for permission to show feelings and participate in honoring the baby. In response to the death, they may feel denial, guilt, or any other expression. They may also begin to show signs of separation anxiety, and their performance at school may decline. Remember that their feelings are important and need to be validated to promote healthy grieving. Give honest and compassionate answers to reassure it is all right to feel the way they do. Even older kids need to be hugged and held to give assurance that you are available and going through this with them.

Teenagers:
Teenagers have more adult thought processes. They are able to think abstractly and understand the implications of death. Teenagers have feelings of immortality, yet are able to realize the fragility of life. Besides general expressions of grief, when confronted with death they may become preoccupied with death or dying, or may exhibit risk-taking behavior. Encouraging communication or lovingly confronting your child about their feelings may help their grieving process. Many times you can look to a trusted friend for your child to confide in.

How will my child grieve?

General expressions of grief can include...

Denial
Refusing to accept death is normal, and will lessen in time.

Sadness
Children feel sadness and loneliness, but experience it in shorter periods of time. It may be hard for them to understand or verbalize how they are feeling.

Anxiety
The family may be in turmoil if the death was sudden. Some factors that contribute to worry and fear can include parental relations, how the family deals with grief, or how the family deals with each other during difficult times.

Bodily Distress or Behavior Problems
Children may have headaches, problems sleeping, or repeated illnesses. They may, also, show unusual anger, hostility, or stubbornness. Children may behave inappropriately to get a punishment they feel they deserve or take part in attention seeking behaviors. Talking out their feelings will help reduce these symptoms of grief.

Anger or Blame
Children may be angry with the people caring for the mother or baby, and may feel the baby should have been saved. Unexpressed anger and hostility may be directed at people not even involved in the death, or may come without warning. Children may blame and be angry with parents, hospital professionals, or even God.

Guilt
Children who harbor guilt feel they cannot let anyone know because it may validate their guilt and lead to punishment. They may think they should have died instead of their sibling. Extreme guilt may lead to seeking punishment or thinking of suicide.

Depression
Children who are depressed generally have an extreme change from their normal behavior. They may be withdrawn, tired, or they may have dramatic changes in their appetite and sleep routines. If depression persists, professional counseling should be encouraged.

Indifference
Some children prefer a certain detachment from family grief. Remember, every child is unique in how they express their grief.
What is important to my grieving child?

Children want to share their experience of grief with adults. Your child’s love for the baby may be very special. They usually want to share their feelings; they do not want to be told how to feel. They want adults to listen to how they experience loss. Open-ended questions can help you talk and listen to what your child feels. When talking about the baby you can say things such as “How does that make you feel?” or “What would you like to do for the baby?”

Never deceive your child to protect them. Children need honesty. In general, children find ways to cope with sad news. It is important to refrain from using clichés, half-truths, and fairy tales that cannot explain the mystery of death. Lying, or dismissing the topic, leaves too much to their imagination. It may teach the child that we do not have to be honest when dealing with others. Unhealthy explanations can also create fear, doubt, or anger. Remember, children think literally. Using phrases like “we lost the baby,” “the baby is sleeping with God,” “the baby went on a long trip,” or “the baby is watching over you now” can be confusing because of the literal meaning of the phrases, and because they do not explain honestly what has happened. Using a phrase like “The baby died.” That means her heart stopped beating and her body doesn’t work anymore. She is not with us like she used to be, but we will always remember and love her very much,” explains literally what happened and how you feel about it. Children need simple, honest explanations.

Allow your child to ask questions. Younger children tend to repeat the same question again and again, perhaps to assure themselves that the story is still the same. Each time you repeat the story or circumstance honestly, you are allowing the child to understand more deeply. Because you, too, are grieving, you may feel frustrated with this process. Children learn how to cope with their grief from your sincere feelings, actions, and responses to their questions. Do your best to be patient and open, and ask for help when you need it.

Children want to be heard and understood. Each child’s thoughts and feelings are important and must be treated as such. Children are very sensitive to energy levels, moods, tones of voices, and choices of words. Children know you are actively listening to them when you make eye contact and respond without judgment.

We don’t grieve in steps or stages. Don’t expect your child to grieve in an orderly fashion. They generally grieve in shorter bursts, with a wide range of emotions and reactions. They cannot sustain grief in the same way as adults. They grieve, and then move away from the pain. Each child is different and special, even when they are in the same family. The length of time a person grieves and how they show their grief depends on their emotional investment in the situation.

We experience grief as a process, not an event. The healing process happens over time. A grieving child is unable to hurry through their emotions and get over it. Just as you will miss the baby on special occasions like birthdays and holidays, so will your child. If they cannot communicate how they feel verbally, it is possible they will express it in their behavior.

How will I know if my child needs additional intervention?

Children, just as you, will continue to grieve and heal over time. Additional help can come from extended family, close friends, teachers, counselors, social workers, therapists, etc. The following behaviors can be indicators that your child needs more help in finding healthy ways to grieve. You may want to consider seeking more help if you have any serious concerns, or if your child...

...pretends nothing ever happened
...develops a fear of school or school work dramatically declines
...threatens suicide
...frequently panics or shows excessive anxiety
...physically attacks other people or is cruel to animals
...behaves poorly with family members
...becomes involved with drugs or alcohol
...begins committing serious socially delinquent acts
...is unwilling or unable to socialize with other children

Our children grieve too. They need honesty, validation, and compassion during this difficult time. Allow your child to talk, listen with your heart, and give yourself permission to provide and receive support as you mourn together.

Children’s Grief

© 2004

A brief reference for those who are supporting a child whose sibling died during pregnancy or in the first few months of life.

Children’s Grief

A brief reference for those who are supporting a child whose sibling died during pregnancy or in the first few months of life.